LCU 8th Inaugural Lecture by Prof. Adeyemo K. Aderemi: Concluding Remarks

From the discussion of this lecture on the subject matter, corruption has been a major setback on the developmental process of the Nigerian economy. Corruption has generated unimaginable level of poverty. This has further destroyed good governance.

In Nigeria, corruption has led to decaying infrastructure, inadequate medical services, falling educational standards, and mismanagement of foreign. Adeyemo and Ayilara(2011).

Corruption is a universal phenomenon. It exists in developed countries, but it is much more pronounced in developing countries. It has been systemized in Nigeria and it exists in high and low level of the society. Nigerian government is now seeking help from local and international organizations on the way to curtail, and, if possible, eliminate it completely in the country.

Stapenhurst and Sedigh (1999) enumerate the cost of corruption as: distorting choice; damaging the economic life of society; increasing the cost of goods and services; promoting unproductive investment in projects that are not economically viable or sustainable; contributing to decline in standards ; and possibility increasing a country's indebtedness and improvement. In many countries where corruption thrives with its attendant consequences as highlighted here, weak institutions may be a propelling factor.

For instance, the World Bank (2012) posits that poor institutions result in weak or failed service delivery, wasted public funds, demoralized civil servants, and a disaffected public. Poor, weak, or ineffective institutions allow corruption and malfeasance to prosper. Poor institutions fail to reflect or record citizen views and aspirations, and are an obstacle to achieving gender equality. Institutions lie at the heart of development.

Ocholor and Bassey (2010) aver that corruption is a universal human practice, and no society exists without some form of it. However, the incidence of corruption seems to be more prevalent in some societies than in others. Though minor differences exist as to what constitutes corrupt practices or the extent of corrupt practices among different nations, there is a universal agreement to the fact that corruption itself is an antisocial behavior that portends danger to society's cohesive fabric and its potential growth and development. In Nigeria, corruption has continued to hamper development as government exists largely for the benefit of the privileged few in the society. (Adeyemo, 2009).
